RIGHTSIDE UP; Landon Mackenzie and Paul Mathieu is a collaborative exhibition.

Landon Mackenzie, recipient of the inaugural Ian Wallace Award for Excellence in Teaching in 2009, teaches at Emily Carr University of Art + Design in Vancouver and is no stranger to the Okanagan. Her exhibition Parallel Journey: Works on Paper (1975–2015), curated by art historian Liz Wylie showed at the Kelowna Art Gallery in 2016, accompanied by a retrospective book published by Black Dog Press, London, UK. During this time The Mentorship Program with UBCO's Faculty of Creative and Critical Studies invited Landon Mackenzie to be the mentor. "This new program assists students to learn from successful artists through presentations, one on one clinics, informal round tables, visits and collaborative sessions," says June Nicolay, the Kelowna benefactor of the program. Mackenzie's mentoring initiated a collaborative "mail art" project between Emily Carr University and UBCO students. Mackenzie refers to her works on paper as a parallel practice to the production of her large works in painting that she is critically recognized for. Her accomplishments are formidable and her works can be seen in significant national museum, embassy and corporate collections. The Vancouver Art Gallery exhibited Emily Carr and Landon Mackenzie: Wood Chopper and the Monkey September 2014 to April 2015 – two female artists whose 'waves' cannot be ignored.

Paul Mathieu is also an international presence in the art world, recognised for his work in ceramics. He too teaches at Emily Carr University of Art + Design in Vancouver where he has led cutting edge research into new possibilities with ceramics and has published extensively. Mathieu's connection to the Okanagan comes through Oakes' recent exhibition at The Canadian Clay and Glass Gallery Awestruck Calendar of Ecology where Paul Mathieu was concurrently exhibiting a porcelain and digital photography project, Flower Vases with Flowers in a Vase.

Headbones Gallery is exhibiting twelve of his Kiss Bowls, works made in Jingdezhen China where all of the services that carry an idea through to a physical end were at his disposal and backed by over a thousand years of perfecting porcelain. The history of Jingdezhen and porcelain was as dramatic as the gold rush for making porcelain was an art guarded by the Chinese and bartered as world trade expanded. In The Kiss Bowls Paul Mathieu shows that there is more connectivity than protection in contemporary art practices.

The major piece that Headbones is presenting by Landon Mackenzie is a gigantic painting aptly titled Runway. When standing in front of this piece, a sense of open space propelled by a two point perspective appears to emanate from the center in wiggling waves as if bearing witness to a theory of evolution that could give rise to infinite creations. This sensation is reinforced by medallions, like Chinese symbols or invisible signals floating in the air like snow in the whirl of a blizzard. It sums up the concept of centrifugal imagery. Runway like many of Mackenzie's large works was made over a period of time. Mackenzie is also showing small works on paper in inks and watercolour and a few small canvases.

Paul Mathieu takes another potent icon, the kiss, and reveals the universality of this embrace by examining it through many aesthetic combinations. The kiss is also a vortex. From the centre the kiss pulses out and around, from one to another, an interchange of energy. Mathieu revisits the kiss many times and we grow giddy with the possibilities he has conjured from the same act of two lips meeting as the initial first step in many liaisons, connections or pairings is made both universal and specific under his hand. Kiss Bowls having been made in China are evidence of the success of the process which was also a pairing, a relinquishing of individual identity in a creative and poignant meeting. Mathieu invited the Chinese artists who worked with him to lend their own input to each piece, often finishing long after he had withdrawn from the physical process of making. The works retain this input like a memory of an intimate moment for Mathieu elevates the meeting of individual entities at the exact time when they physically connect.

Landon Mackenzie's work often begins with cartography and maps her journeys through a unique and expressive mode of mark making. The digital age has brought about maps that may today reside more often in a hand-held device than on paper. Mackenzie, with her references to cartography encompasses the original meaning of mapping – to stay on track so as not to get lost when negotiating new terrains. Hers are mind maps that open an awareness of the relationship between a journey and inner meanderings. By rooting this inner voyage in an expressive piece, she grants directions without pinning down a route that has to be taken by the 'reader' of her 'map'. In this way the nuances of her personality also lend shape and colour to the viewers' experience of the works without dictating the way that they mentally traverse the time spent in the presence of the piece.

Rightside Up reinforces the scope made possible when two artists with evident mutual affection and respect for the other's works exhibit in tandem while in turn their works inspire others. Informed and confident, each artist maintains a mature practice that can help us to override the cacophony of modern dissonance.

Landon Mackenzie (Runway or Runaway)

When Paul Mathieu and I were approached to collaborate on a show together at Headbones, I knew that it would be a special opportunity to work with good people in a unique location. With our wildly different practices and media what were the commonalities and what would work? Paul and I have taught together and have known each other for many years. His career, where he has worked extensively in China for over two decades, has influenced my understanding of ceramic art, globalized production opportunities, and our common interest in colour, surface and pattern. On Paul's urging I had commissioned a large round wool and silk carpet in 2014 from my design of a map of the world for my Vancouver Art Gallery exhibition with the iconic Emily Carr. I have now travelled three times to Beijing as a visiting artist-professor at the Central Fine Art Academy (CAFA) in Beijing – probably because Paul had planted the seed in my imagination.

When the Kelowna Art Gallery put together my extensive survey exhibition (curated by Liz Wylie and touring Canada till 2018), and Ashok Mathur and UBCO asked me to be a Mentor for 2015, I had a chance to experience the beauty of the Okanagan. One evening when I was installing my KAG show, I came with friends to Headbones for an opening and saw what a special project Julie Oakes and Richard Fogarty have created for the region.

In putting together a selection Paul and I agreed that if he showed his wonderful Kiss Bowls, I would need to match him en face with a new landscape. I had just finished Runway, which I had begun after one of my trips to Beijing in 2012 and its expansive landscape motif seemed fitting to this project. In Runway one of the concepts was to remember the feeling of travelling up the coast of North America to cross at the Bering Strait and down into Asia, following the sun, and then returning the same way. I liked the idea of it being a surprise to the gallery visitors fitting it, a huge piece, into the long narrow gallery space where it can look out the windows at the valley.

To include more intimate things too at the scale of Kiss Bowls, we made collectively a selection of small works on paper in inks and watercolour that will be familiar to anyone who saw “Landon Mackenzie: Parallel Journey” and then added a few small canvases. What viewers will make of the experience of Mathieu and Mackenzie? Maybe something that addresses pattern and colour in certain ways, and to consider which is the right way up.

Paul Mathieu (from “Making china in China”)

The Kiss Bowls:

I have been going to China for many years now, in order to do a significant part of my work in ceramics collaboratively. This work takes place in a variety of sites, one of the most important is Jingdezhen in Jiangxi province, known as the “porcelain capital”, since it is the place where porcelain was “invented” one thousand years ago and where most of the Imperial wares we see in museums worldwide were actually made. It is still a place where this tradition is maintained and where an amazing array of expertise is found.

On this trip, I bought from an art supply store in Shanghai on my way to Jingdezhen another classical plaster cast to use. Here again, the solution for its intended purpose became instantly obvious as soon as I saw it. It consists of an actual plaster cast of the lips of Michelangelo's David. It presents a rather large set of fleshy lips, cut out from the face of the sculpture in order to present the facial feature within a rectangular block shape. Such plaster casts of famous sculptures are found in all art supply stores in China and used as props for drawing. They are very cheap, both in term of cost and in aesthetic quality. They are casts of casts of casts and rather degenerate in the process, which gives them a quality that is at the same time quite attractive and also a bit repulsive.

By making a negative of that form (a plaster mold) and press-molding two of them with clay, they can then be reassembled as one, lip to lip, to make a “Kiss Bowl”. Such a bowl presents no real top or bottom and can be displayed or used in both directions, as it features alternatively two concave cavities that can then be painted individually with the various decorative designs and schemes available in town, from all the specialists at work all over the place. The range of colors and patterns available is quite simply astounding. I will make quite a few of these kiss bowls, even modifying the design from a rectangle to a circle eventually. They are quite beautiful while remaining challenging. The lips can be realistically painted in diverse fleshy tones, while a moustache can also be added (or not) to create multi-gendered couplings, male/female, female/female and male/male. They are altogether fun, charming yet remain aesthetically complex and conflicted, offering a balance of potential experiences of variety and generosity. They are some of the best work I have made in JDZ, in their effective directness and seeming simplicity.

Their exterior is painted in underglaze cobalt blue with pairings of images and patterns, reinforcing the coupling references, while their interior receives colorful overglaze enamels and “over-the-top” decorative surfacing of shocking and contrasting effect. Again, as has been my practice all along with this collaborative work in China, I will not dictate to the specialist painters what these surfaces are to be. For the underglaze blue, I will simply suggest various vignettes to be located on available surfaces around the exterior rim of the bowls, of scenes of couplings, two flowers, two birds, two bicycles, two telephones, etc. etc. and for the interiors various typical, traditional Jingdezhen decorative overglaze surfaces. These various patterns while culturally distinctive, I do not particularly see as specifically “Chinese” but instead as part of the extensive vocabulary of “ceramic” patterns specific to this art form. Obviously, I am not Chinese and I do not speak Chinese either, but I do speak Ceramics and it is as such that I feel a certain proprietary right to the use of these culturally rich symbols and images. They are signs for ceramics, specifically, and are to be understood as such.

I will indicate that the exterior underglaze blue decorations be painted in both directions, some right side up, some upside down on each object so that the object can be positioned in either direction and doesn't have a specific top or bottom position. The final, rather arbitrary combinations of pattern and surfaces will be more or less successful, some quite amazing, other not so much, but all will be nonetheless of sufficient interest and weird strangeness to be worthwhile and deserving of existence. The overall impression is one of excess and exuberance that takes full advantage of the great potential for decorative exploration found in the ceramics vocabulary and repertoire of JDZ porcelain. They gave me a lot of fun to make and a lot of pleasure subsequently. Hopefully, they will do so for others too, eventually.

One more significant detail about the Kiss Bowls. Each bowl ends up being painted by at least three different painters, one for the exterior surfaces, one for the interior and another for the lips and moustaches. With the first batch I made during one of my first trips, I had the moustaches painted by one of the painter working right within the studio I was sharing with various workers at the Sculpture Factory. He did a superb job, curling the extremities of each hair with extraordinary elegance and refinement. I was more than pleased, thrilled really. A few years later on a return trip while working at the Pottery Workshop this time, I will make more Kiss Bowls, some rectangular, some round, to test that proposition, some press-molded and some cast, to also test that possibility. I will make quite a few, upward to two dozens or so, which is quiet rare for me who basically does only one of anything, mostly. I will need someone again to paint the moustaches on these new kiss bowls. My friendly painter is not at work anymore at the old factory across the street where I used to work myself, all by myself with my necessary and so useful assistant Min. I ask around where he can be found. It takes quite a while to locate him, as he is now working in a new place, somewhat out of the way from the main street where most studios are located. We go make him a visit. He is quite happy to see me, as always, and he agrees to come with us to my new studio to see the work to be done, so we can argue the price and get started. He recognizes my kiss bowls, remembers them well and agrees to paint the necessary lips and moustaches. He will need to come back the next day with his material as it would be too complicated to bring all the work to him at his new, out-of-the-way place. He who had done such an exquisite job the first time, will paint the new moustaches as if with a toothbrush, each hair crude and bristly and positioned awkwardly in relation to the lip and with no elegant curlicue at the end. What a disappointment. I nonetheless decide to fire them as is and accept the vagaries of context, always a necessary attitude to have here. I may be the only one to notice, the only one to care, but I do wish all my moustaches were as elegant as in the first batch!
